Manuscript Formatting via CSS: A Long-Form Example (typical)

A Compliant Manuscript with Chapters and Scenes

Chapter 1

This document templates a long-form narrative that is divided into the more typical chapters and scenes (no parts). Most short stories are just a series of scenes. Most books-length (long-form) manuscripts are divided into chapters and scenes w/o parts. But some books are also divided into books or parts. Of the three components, only scenes are required. But here, we demo the long-form typical: chapters and scenes.

Side note: the dotted lines in the HTML view are simulalated page breaks. They can be turned off with the `no-simulations` switch. HTML doesn't "page break" so we put in an indicator as an approximation of the behavior.

The only time I turn off the page break similation is when I am sharing the document as an HTML page. I.e., when the HTML becomes the primary end artifact.

Chapter 2

Only one scene for chapter 2 because I think you get the idea.

Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet, consectetur adipiscing elit. Nam a placerat lorem, a sagittis risus. Curabitur erat risus, congue in lacinia ac, viverra molestie tellus. Morbi convallis velit non sem venenatis consectetur. Nam congue posuere magna nec vulputate. Donec sodales nisl id mi fringilla elementum. Donec in feugiat mauris, quis laoreet lorem. Suspendisse non mi velit.

Nunc sed massa lacinia, accumsan est at, laoreet neque. Integer vestibulum eget eros eu molestie. Quisque facilisis molestie elit at suscipit. Cras et felis tortor. Morbi mi libero, luctus ut scelerisque at, cursus ac ex. Proin tristique ligula sed neque dapibus, quis fermentum dui faucibus. In consectetur sapien non rhoncus fermentum. Etiam sit amet leo dolor. Donec eget velit cursus mauris suscipit mattis ac sit amet purus.

Epilogue

You get the idea. I am ending this manuscript with this scene.

Also, did you notice the # dinkuses between the scenes? And the The End at the end?

That's a typographical marker called a -30-. You can turned them off or change them by redefining CSS variabbles `--m-dinkus` and `--m-30-`. For example, set `--m-dinkus` to an empty string `""` to turn it off and set `--m-30-` to "La Fin" just because you think your critique readers reviewers will be impressed with your French.
